Alfred de Bréanski Jnr – “Ullswater” - ref 1796

“Ullswater” is a tranquil evening lake scene set in the English Lake District, painted by Alfred Fontville de Bréanski, son of famous artist father and mentor, Alfred de Bréanski. Alfred Jr. painted mainly landscapes with subject matter similar to his father, namely English, Welsh or Highland lake or loch scenes usually during sunrise or sunset capturing that mystic glow of the red skied half light magically on canvas. He probably found it hard following in the footsteps of such a renowned father and took a while to decide on his own identity, sometimes signing his work A. Fontville, sometimes using the name Gustave

Courtier when he painted flowers; he eventually established a signature similar to his fathers, signing his paintings either “Alfred Jnr or A F de Bréanski”. Comparisons were often made by experts as to the quality of his work compared to his father, a general consensus amongst these experts suggests that AF’s work was not always quite as good father’s, however many times his work did equal or exceed that Alfred Snr.
